Prior Application:

Dear Colleague:

This Law School Report includes a transcript of the candidate's enrollment during Spring 2020 and/or subsequent semesters during which the COVID-19 pandemic affected students' education. The COVID-19 pandemic emerged in early 2020, and the response of many higher education institutions was to convert mid-semester to online education and to announce changes in their traditional grading systems. During Spring 2020, Fall 2020 and subsequent semesters, many students were faced with unanticipated changes in the circumstances of their enrollment.

During Spring 2020, students on residential campuses were in many cases required to leave campus with little advance notice; students on spring break were instructed not to return to campus. Many international students either could not leave campus or could not return to their home countries. As the Fall 2020 semester began, schools that may have planned for in-person classes were forced to pivot to online or hybrid classes with very little notice to students. The disruption to students' lives from the rapid change in their physical and learning environments may have included effects on physical or mental health, financial security, and access to academic resources and support services.

Notably, many colleges and universities changed their grading systems. Some converted to a mandatory Pass/Fail (or similar) system, others permitted students to choose whether to receive traditional or Pass/Fail grades, still others retained their traditional grading systems.

This letter is included in the Law School report as a reminder of the unusual and difficult circumstances surrounding enrollment during the period of time when the COVID-19 pandemic presented a barrier to traditional learning. Law school admission staff may wish to take these circumstances into account.

Sincerely,

LSAC Credential Processing

Civil Disobedience

When people disagree with their government's laws or policies, they may act on that sentiment in different ways. They may elect political leaders who promise to change such laws, or they may engage in legal forms of protest, such as letter-writing campaigns, boycotts, or peaceful demonstrations. But when people view a particular law as unjust, they sometimes choose to commit an unlawful act in protest. In many such cases, that action is taken to send a clear message, publicly communicating that they believe a law is unjust—for example, when people publicly refuse to be drafted into military service. When such law-breaking is performed nonviolently, it is often referred to as "civil disobedience." While breaking the law in this way is, of course, legally impermissible, the question arises as to whether civil disobedience is ever the right thing to do nonetheless.

KEY QUESTION: When, if ever, is civil disobedience warranted?

Read and carefully consider the arguments presented in the following perspectives. Each suggests a particular way of thinking about the issue captured in the Key Question.

Perspective 1 — an excerpt from a lecture on political science

Societies create laws in order to achieve justice. This value both justifies the idea of law and provides a standard against which individual laws ought to be judged. Respect for the law requires holding a law to that standard of justice instead of unquestioningly following a law that fails to live up to that standard. In fact, our obligation to follow a law extends only insofar as the law in question aligns with the notions of justice that undergird our legal system. If a particular law falls short of achieving that goal, breaking it may be the best way to raise awareness of that law's deficiencies and bring the overall system of law more in harmony with the broader conceptions of justice that a society endorses. Consider the example of civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr., who nonviolently broke local segregation laws as part of his protest against these laws. By engaging in civil disobedience, King brought attention to a serious injustice, helping to spur much-needed legal reform in the area of civil rights. In circumstances where the law and justice cannot be brought into alignment in some other way, civil disobedience is not just acceptable; it's obligatory.

Perspective 2 — an excerpt from an editorial in a national newspaper

No person occupies a privileged position from which they alone can decide what is just. Because of our fundamental fallibility as individuals, we must rely on our collective judgment to decide on issues that affect us all. The legitimacy of the law rests not just on the fact that justice is its goal: It also rests on the fact that creating laws democratically represents our best approach to achieving justice. Moreover, because laws maintain social order and facilitate a smoothly functioning society, they thereby safeguard this collective pursuit of justice.

When people violate established law in the name of justice, they fail to recognize these truths: They erroneously claim to know justice better than the rest of us, and they think this exempts them from following the same laws we do. Worse, because law-breaking threatens the social order, these protesters make it harder for us to achieve a just society. Some protesters, for example, block traffic to protest government policies but these kinds of protests can delay emergency vehicles, disrupt commerce, and create safety hazards for the people around them. These protesters are forgetting that they already had an opportunity to make their views known: by voting, speaking with their representatives, or participating in public hearings, for example. Assuming they took advantage of such opportunities, they already voiced their opinions; it's simply that most of us disagreed.

Perspective 3 — an excerpt from a legal history podcast

I can accept that it is sometimes legitimate to break an unjust law in order to bring about that law's reform or repeal. But it seems to me that most cases of so-called "civil disobedience" operate quite differently. Let's look at two separate cases. The first is the case where groups of protesters occupy government buildings or public spaces in order to protest what they consider to be some unjust law or government policy. Now, I can't recall any instance where the people occupying public spaces were protesting the law against trespassing, which is the law they were actually breaking. And typically, such protesters don't think the law of trespassing is illegitimate or unfair. It is simply inappropriate to break a legitimate law in order to protest an illegitimate law, since the legitimacy of the law obligates our obedience to it.

In the second case, consider political actions that are performed covertly—that is, with no overt communication to articulate the nature of the protesters' dissent—such as when activists secretly free animals from farms or from research facilities where animals are used as test subjects. Should we really conceive of this as "civil disobedience" if there is no clear attempt to rally public opinion to change a particular law? If a law is judged to be unjust, our primary obligation ought to be working to change that law. Acting in any other way simply promotes anarchy.

Prewriting Analysis: Generating Ideas for Your Argumentative Essay

Spend the remainder of your prewriting time working through the prewriting questions presented below. These questions are intended to help you think critically about the issue and generate productive ideas for your essay. Record your thoughts in your digital scratch paper by making notes or lists, or by writing short answers to the questions.

Your notes in response to the prewriting questions will still be available to you while you write your essay, but they will not be evaluated or included as part of your essay. These questions are strictly provided to help guide your analysis of the perspectives and to help you develop your own argument in response to the Key Question.

Prewriting Questions

- Which perspective(s) do you find most compelling?
- What relevant insights do you see in the perspective(s)?
- What principles or values do you see at work in the perspective(s)?
- What strengths and weaknesses can you find in the perspective(s)?

Your argument should incorporate or address ideas from at least one of the perspectives provided. In addition, your own knowledge, experiences, and personal values can be valid sources of evidence, and you can include these in your essay:

- What knowledge do you already have about this issue? Consider information you have read or heard, including things you've learned at home or school, etc.
- What values influence your position on this issue? Consider your worldview or belief system, as well as any guiding principles or convictions you hold.
- What experiences do you have that might be relevant to this issue? Consider any personal experience you might have with this or similar issues, or other relevant lessons learned from your own life.

Response:

Society needs laws to function. After all, our democracy is founded on rules and regulations set in place to keep our civilization functioning properly. No matter how far back in time you go, humans have always been ruled by some form of law. Even from the earliest days of known humans, they had to create rules to survive. Laws are essential and for the most part beneficial, however, that being said, there are circumstances where civil disobedience is warranted and even helpful.

To begin, if laws are too restrictive, people will not follow them. As society develops and intelligence grows in ways we could have never imagined, people will begin to question institutions. An excerpt from a lecture on political science says that "our obligation to follow a law extends only insofar as the law in question aligns with the notions of justice that undergird our legal system." This underscores the power of the human mind of following and interpreting laws. If a person does not feel that a law is operating correctly, they should have the right to "raise awareness of that law's deficiencies (perspective 1)." In other words, if people feel that a law could be working better, that should absolutely have the right to employ civil disobedience because they should not be expected to blindly follow a law they do not feel is just. If instances of civil disobedience had never happened in past, there's no telling what kind of mindset people would still have. At the end of the day, civil disobedience is what has pushed our society to evolve for the better.

Moreover, laws and policies can lead to groupthink which is ultimately detrimental to society. If no laws are ever challenged or it is seen as impermissible to challenge them, then the circulation of ideas will be suppressed. The Marketplace of Free Expression is developed upon the ideals of new ideas and intellectual challenge. These type of situations improve society. Without them, people lose their urge to think on their own. If following the law without question becomes the norm, people will stop questioning, and curiosity is the heart of innovation. Civil disobedience challenges this by reminding people of the rights they are entitled to and the beauty in thinking for yourself.

An excerpt from an editorial in a national newspaper argues that protesting and civil disobedience make it harder for us to achieve a just society. I respectfully disagree with this idea. What even is a just society? If one cannot speak their mind and challenge others-- how is that just? I believe a just society involves the exchange of ideas, disagreements, protests, and collaboration. Without this, we would find ourselves under authoritarian leadership, not a democracy. This convoluted idea of people thinking they "know justice better" and "think this exempts them from following the same laws" (Perspective 2) is exhaustingly outdated. Fighting for what you believe in is a core First Amendment Right and is a catalyst for so many important societal reforms.

All in all, policies and laws are an integral part of society and have been for a very long time. However, civil disobedience is also an integral part of society. Without it, we are reverting to a government that we strove so hard to detach from. Whether people decide to not follow laws, engage in groupthink, or challenge the definition of society, civil disobedience can be a helping hand in circumventing these issues and reinforcing the ideals in which our democracy was founded.

To Whom It May Concern:

It is my distinct pleasure to recommend Elizabeth "Libby" Dorin for admission to your law school. I had the privilege of supervising Libby during her time as a Research Assistant at the Deason Criminal Justice Reform Center, and I can say with full confidence that she is one of the most capable, dedicated, and promising future attorneys I have encountered.

Libby's work at the Deason Center showcased her exceptional research and analytical abilities. She reviewed and coded complex case files using Qualtrics surveys, cleaned and refined interview transcripts, and used MAXQDA software to code and analyze qualitative data, extracting critical themes to inform our research on indigent defense funding impacts. She also played a key role in compiling comprehensive reports on defendant histories and contributed to a major project analyzing systemic inequities in New York's criminal justice system. These tasks required not just precision and attention to detail, but also an understanding of the broader human impact behind the data — something Libby consistently demonstrated.

Beyond her technical skill, Libby brings intellectual curiosity, work ethic, and heart to her work. Her experiences at the Deason Center deepened her understanding of the challenges facing marginalized communities within the criminal justice system. She is motivated to use her legal education to pursue reform, human rights work, and social justice advocacy. Libby's academic excellence at Southern Methodist University — where she maintains a 4.0 GPA, named a Pre-Law Scholar, and inducted into multiple honors societies — further reflects her discipline, intellectual rigor, and drive for excellence.

Libby aspires to build a career at the intersection of law, research, and advocacy, working toward criminal justice reform and broader systemic change. She is exactly the kind of student — and future lawyer — who will not only succeed academically, but who will make meaningful contributions to the legal profession and to society.

I am excited to see where her talents and career take her. If there is any additional information I can provide, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

Victoria M. Smiegocki

To Whom It May Concern,

Elizabeth (Libby) Dorin was a student in my SMU media-and-politics class in the Fall 2024 semester. Throughout the course, she consistently displayed strong analytical skills as well as an ability to listen to her classmates in the discussion-driven classes. Libby was poised, spoke evenly and with authority, and handled herself well in difficult situations.

On the night of the 2024 presidential election, she led her team of three or four fellow students in filing timely and persuasive commentaries for SMU's Daily Campus, an online newspaper that was publishing throughout the evening. With deadlines approaching and information about various election results in flux, she guided her team in meeting its deadlines with insightful commentaries about the unfolding evening. As a professional journalist who has had to file analyses on election night deadlines, I can say that work is not without pressures. But Libby kept her composure and met the goal.

Her analytical thinking came through in her regular essays throughout the semester. There was a reason she earned an A in the class (and a 4.0 GPA over four years). Her pieces were clear and analytical, employed precise but simple language, and kept to the single question she was asked to address. The essays did not weave into unrelated topics but met the definition of strong persuasive writing: Address a single idea, back it up with evidence, and end with a persuasive conclusion.

I did not work with Libby on any of her criminal justice project, but I could tell she brings a compassionate, fair-minded approach to issues. That came through in her writings and class discussions.

Finally, Libby was prompt in her attendance. She also did not miss a class. That speaks to her commitment to her work, her professors and her classmates.

I am honored to recommend Libby Dorin for law school and would be glad to field any follow-up questions. My email address is wmckenzie@bushcenter.org and my telephone number is 214-724-9507.

William McKenzie

LSAT Score Information

All LSAT tests are valid and reliable predictors of law school success because they are all composed of questions from the same banks, and all questions are continuously reviewed by experts to ensure quality, reliability, and validity. All test sections include approximately the same number of questions and cover the same content areas of analytical reasoning, logical reasoning, and reading comprehension. The score scale is 120-180 for all tests. The LSAT (including the LSAT-Flex) is the only test specifically designed to predict first-year performance in law school. The LSAT is supported by decades of empirical evidence verifying its efficacy in predicting first-year law school performance by testing skills rated by law professors as most important to classroom success. Percentiles provided with all scores are based on the previous three-year period.

LSAT (5 sections), June 1991 to May 2020

The LSAT using the current 120-180 scale was administered from June 1991 through April 2020, and it consisted of four scored sections and one unscored section. Tests were administered in person at test centers. All scores earned during this period will be averaged together. (Earlier versions of the LSAT, using a different score scale, were offered between 1948 and 1991.)

LSAT-Flex, May 2020 through July 2021

The LSAT-Flex was administered from May 2020 through July 2021, and it consisted of three scored sections and no unscored section. The LSAT-Flex was designed in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Tests were administered online with live remote proctoring. Scores on the LSAT-Flex will be averaged with other LSAT-Flex scores and with the four-section LSAT described below beginning in August 2021.

LSAT (4 sections), From August 2021

The LSAT, beginning in August of 2021, consists of three scored sections and one unscored section, administered online with live remote proctoring. Scores earned on this LSAT and on the LSAT-Flex will be averaged together.
